

Fuel for Thought

Mapping out a plan

Well we have survived the Christmas – New Year season. The rellies have returned home, we've got through the stifling heat, we've had way too much to eat, spent too much money and the kids go back to school next week. (Oh the joy!!!!)

Now is the time that we can get our lives back into some sort of routine and we reflect on the past year and set goals and make plans for this year and the future. It's amazing how a little time spent discussing options, setting goals and priorities, or marking up a calendar can help work through confusion and set us on a clear course for the year ahead. When we take a step back from dealing with the day to day issues, we can see things more clearly, which can help lay out a plan for the future.

These don't need to be over complicated goals. Simple things like catching up with an Aunt you haven't see for a while, spending more time fishing, going camping more often, or organising your personal financial affairs. Some simple steps will help us focus on doing what is important to us and formulate a plan to make it happen.

This year at QER we're doing just that. Taking a step back and organising our work plans, goals and priorities for 2019. Thus enabling us to plan for the future success of developing an industry which will produce Australian made fuel from Queensland's rich kerogen shale resources.
